

What's at stake in Maurice's so-called Platonism?

What's at stake, I believe, is the fundamental distinction between appearance and reality in all its different forms, including, above all, that between what is thought to be so ("opinions," that which may be) and what really is so ("facts," "laws," "that which is").

24 September 2007